LASH SPLASH

Glaucoma meds and red metallic fringe?! There's no end to the frenzy for plush-to-the-max lashes

Madonna may have her diamond-lined flutterers, but victims of skimpy eyelid tresses are now going to other great lengths to achieve come-hither lashes. One of the more surprising developments is Xalatan, a glaucoma medication that inadvertently promotes lash growth. "Patients ask for it all the time—and not because they have glaucoma," says Beverly Hills dermatologist Paul McAndrews. The prescription-only eyedrops, according to the doctor, boast an unusual side effect of making lashes thicker, darker and approximately 20 percent longer. McAndrews insists that Xalatan is safe, but in case you're not comfortable with a drug normally used to reduce ocular pressure, the pricey "eyelash conditioners" now flooding the market may be more your speed. Two options include Revitalash and Jan Marini's Age Intervention Eyelash, which are applied like liquid eyeliner and promise fuller fringes in as little as two weeks. But makeup artist Shane Paish, who works with Charlize Theron and Jessica Alba, prefers to stick to indispensable mascara: "No face is complete without it." Innovative formulas abound, including Fiberwig, a best seller in Japan, and Too Faced's Lash Injection; both coat the lashes and literally form undetectable tubes around them to create a lush effect. Or, if you're tired of buying multiple tubes to lengthen, volumize and curl, pick up Stila's new Multi-Eff mascara, which does all three in one swipe. Still want the flash of faux lashes? Fakes are all about color these days, from Shu Uemura's set of purple, blue and green individual lashes to M.A.C's red metallic pair. But Francesca Tolot, Beyonce's makeup artist, offers this caveat: "If you can't master the application, then go to a professional. Having an eyelash hanging off is one of the biggest 'don'ts' ever." A
